

Expatriate Ecosystems & Corporate Hiring

With insufficient experienced professionals available in the national labour pool, companies are hiring international talent from abroad. Attracting expats is often challenging and too many engagements fail. Frequently due to a lack of vision.

Attracting Expatriate Candidates

Company appeal, job description, remuneration and location are the four major elements of your job offer. Three are under your direct control. The fourth isn't*.

With the competition for expatriate employees on the global stage intense, the deciding factor is very often the desirability of your city.

This key component plays an important role in attracting international personnel. It's a game-changer when your location is well presented and easy to comprehend by prospective candidates. And it beats the competitors.

Retaining Expatriate Employees

Engaging candidates is just the first step. Following relocation, new challenges are perpetually faced by international staff. Creating disruption and costs to employers.

Integration can be difficult for the new employee and for any accompanying partner or children. Less than optimal happiness and loneliness are the phenomena that lead to an enormous percentage of expats returning to their home country. Or searching for a new location with greater appeal.

An uninspiring or misleading image of the location can lead to repeated failures. Thus, the portrayal of where your company is situated is more important than ever before.

Corporate Expat Ecosystems

Amazing Capitals online resources sharpen the fourth aspect* of your recruitment by painting an excellent picture of the location, its citizens and culture. And beyond. As well as attracting, an expat ecosystem supports retaining international employees.

Creating a local eGuide and eBook packed with knowledge offers answers and insights for all stakeholders to raise the ongoing success of relocations. Many options are available to companies in or near the city that wish to improve their chances of hiring the best in the world.

The status quo of researching your location online in English from abroad is frustrating for all. Results are uncontrolled. City websites normally lack the information candidates require. Social media results reveal contradictory opinions rather than facts. In house documentation may lack authority.
